Where This Model Comes From

Developed by Reid and Merrill

Built on observed behavior

Not personality tests or labels.

Two axes. Four styles.

One skill set that works in every sales conversation.

Why It's Important

The ability to adapt your communication style to different individuals and situations is crucial for successful selling.

By knowing your own style and how it might impact others and consciously adjusting your approach to connect with different personalities.

Three Ground Rules Before We Start

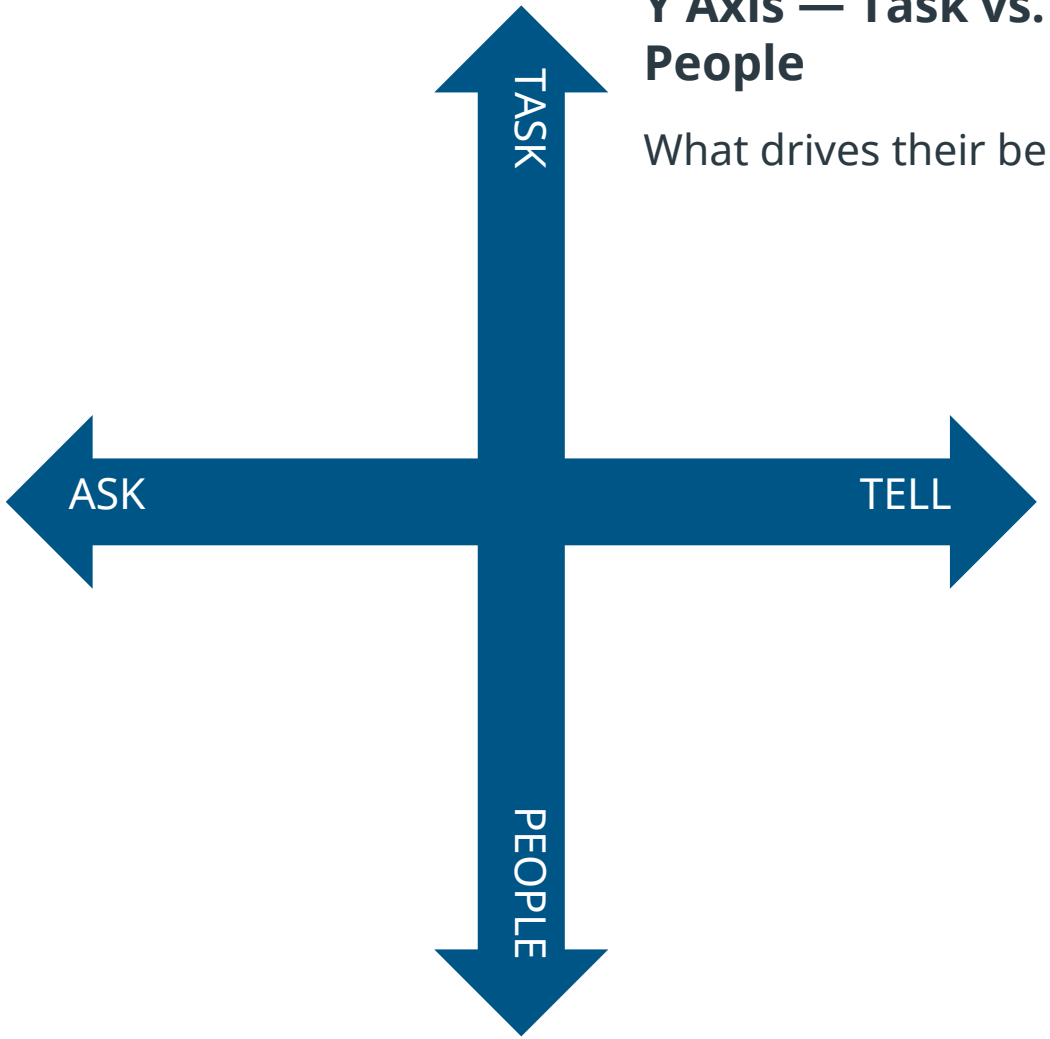

The Two-Axis Framework

Every style lives at the intersection of those two answers.

Y Axis — Task vs. People

What drives their behavior?

X Axis — Ask vs. Tell

How does this person get what they want?

The Four Styles on the Grid

One grid. Four quadrants. Your job is to place the customer before the pitch begins.

Analytical

Asks, Task-focused

Driver

Tells, Task-focused

TASK

ASK

TELL

PEOPLE

Amiable

Asks, People-focused

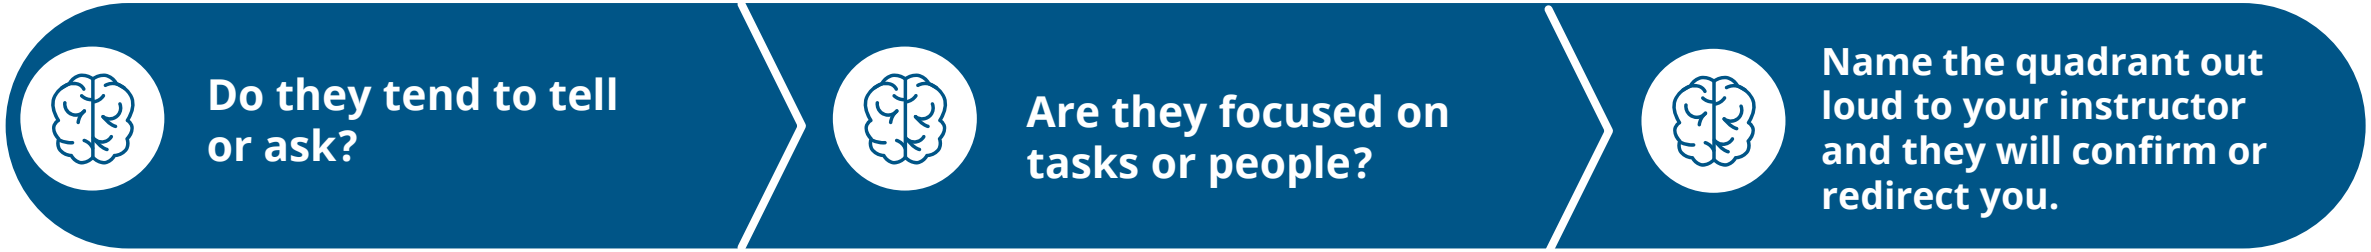

Expressive

Tells, People-focused

Three Questions That Reveal Style

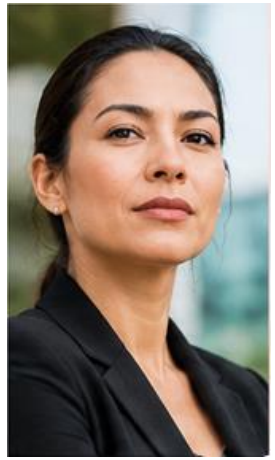

Driver and Analytical — What to Watch For

Both styles run low on visible emotion — the task focus is what separates them.

Driver

- Gives direction
- Decides fast
- Low emotion
- Focused on speed and outcomes

Analytical

- Asks many questions
- Methodical
- Low emotion
- Focused on data and accuracy
- Hates being caught unprepared

Expressive and Amiable — What to Watch For

Both styles run high on emotion — the tell vs. ask instinct is what separates them.

Expressive

- Animated
- Storytelling
- High emotion
- Focused on vision and big possibilities
- Wants to be heard

Amiable

- Soft-spoken
- Warm
- High emotion
- Focused on consensus and relationships
- Avoids conflict and rushed decisions

The Signature Question — Your Live Diagnostic Signal

Hear one of these in the first minutes of a meeting and you have a strong style signal.

Analytical asks "How?"
Focused on process and accuracy

Driver asks "What?"
Focused on results.

Amiable asks "Why?"
Focused on relationships and fit.

Expressive asks "Who?"
Focused on people and vision.

Pressure Behaviors — When the Conversation Goes Off Track

A pressure behavior means something has broken down — it is a signal to slow down and shift.

1. Driver
   Takes control of the meeting

2. Expressive
   Becomes argumentative

3. Analytical
   Asks for more time and more data

4. Amiable
   Goes quiet and withdraws

Mixed Signals? Blame the Adjacent Style

If a customer does not feel like a clean fit, look one quadrant over — that is your answer.

Driver with an Expressive adjacent

- Will be direct but warmer than a pure Driver.

Analytical with an Amiable adjacent

- Will be methodical but more relationship-conscious.

Map a Real Prospect — Activity

Think of a current prospect or a recent customer. How did they speak? What did they ask? How much emotion did they show? Tell your instructor — describe what you observed out loud and ask them to help you map that person to a style and identify their likely signature question.

Selling to a Driver

- Plan for less time than you were given.
- Lead with conclusions and results — save the data as backup.
- Offer clear options and end with specific, actionable next steps.
- Small talk and unnecessary detail damage rapport fast.

Selling to an Analytical

- Prepare detailed, logical questions and use evidence throughout.
- Use Guided Discovery to surface risks of the status quo and competitive alternatives.
- Allow time for evaluation — never rush, never get too personal.
- Justify your process by referencing accuracy and completeness.

Selling to an Expressive

- Focus discovery on their perspectives, dreams, and ambitions.
- Use curiosity questions and let them elaborate fully.
- Show enthusiasm and demonstrate understanding with active listening and non-verbal cues.
- Ask who else should be involved — minimize detail-heavy conversations.

Selling to an Amiable

- Spend real time on rapport before you talk business.
- Explain how you got to this meeting and who introduced you.
- Use "we" language throughout — present verbally and offer detailed follow-up documents.
- Never push or rush a decision. Position yourself as a stable, friendly resource.

Your Own Style Is Part of the Equation

How you naturally sell may land very differently on a customer of another style. A high-Tell, low-emotion Driver rep can shut down an Amiable customer before the conversation starts — without realizing it. Awareness of your own defaults is the first step to adjusting them.

Role-Play — Practice the Tactics Live

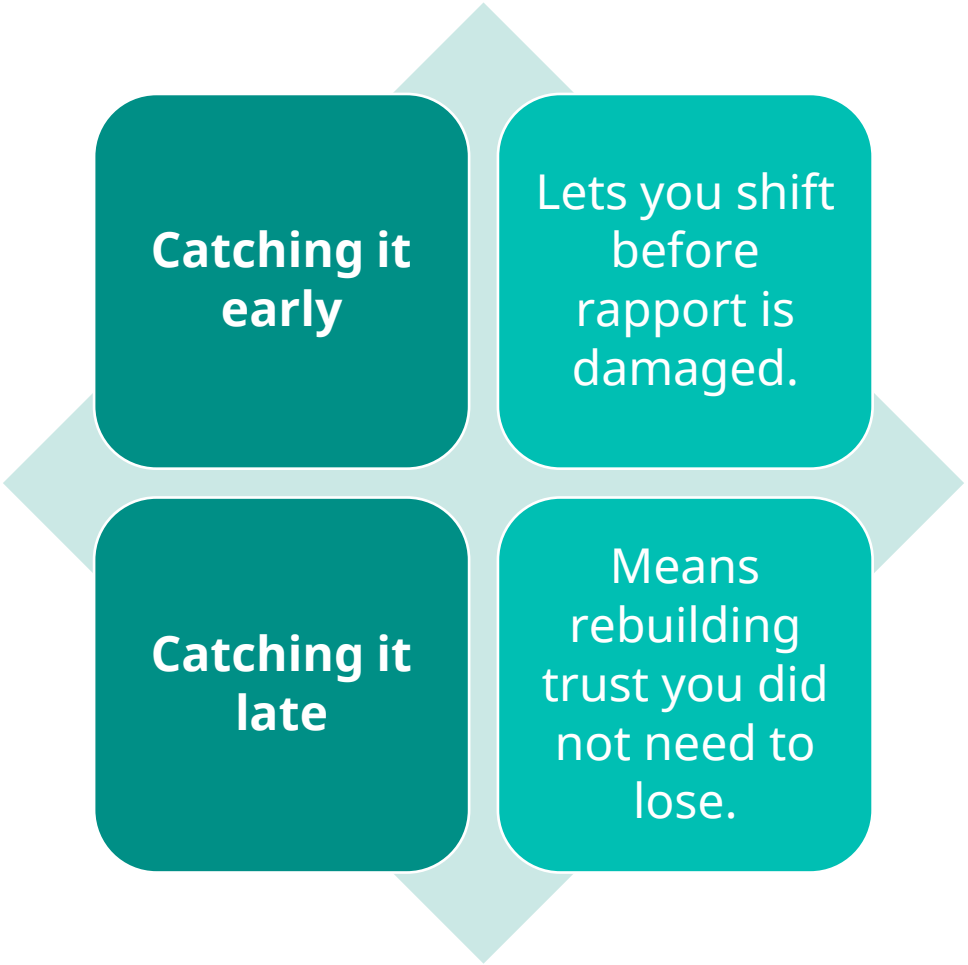

What Versatility Actually Means

Versatility is the deliberate act of adjusting your communication approach to reduce friction and connect more effectively. It is not about becoming someone you are not — it is about removing barriers in the relationship. Reps with high versatility earn trusted advisor status because customers feel understood regardless of style.

Spotting a Mismatch Early

A pressure behavior or a sudden drop in engagement is your early warning signal.

Versatility Is a Discipline, Not a Trait

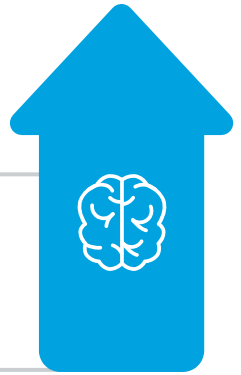

You do not need a different personality for each customer. You need one disciplined habit: read the cues, name the style, adjust the approach. Style is the vehicle — the destination is always the same: a meaningful, trusted relationship that leads to a sale.

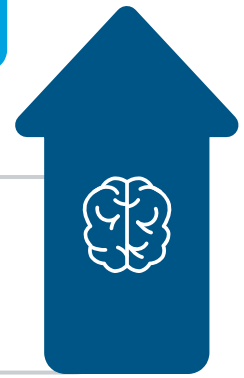

Know Your Own Style — Final Activity

Find Your Social Style

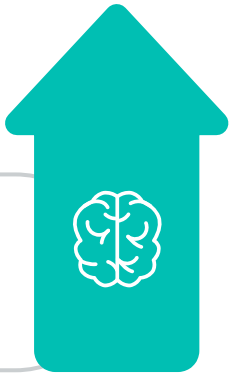

Tell your instructor what you believe your dominant Social Style is

Describe one type of customer you find it hardest to connect with

Ask your instructor to explain what that style mismatch looks like from the customer's side and what one specific adjustment you can make in your very next meeting.

Optional Knowledge Check

A brief private quiz is available to reinforce the four styles, signature questions, pressure behaviors, and selling tactics.
Nothing is recorded. It is for your own confidence.
Ask your instructor how to access it when you are ready.
